THE SANTA CRUZ RIVER.

This well-known river so prominently identified in the history of Arizona's past has a peculiar feature about it not known to those abread and which cannot be grappled with and solved by strangers not posted in solving a water problem which has called to its solution the skilled aquatic scientists of the present age. The Santa Cruz sinks from its surface river bed source a short distance above Tucson and resumes its flow westward to the Colorado river, ed four nations in the persons of the through the medium of a subterraneau channel. Over this great natural subterranean river are spread out millions of mores of as fertile soil as ever the ruler of the universe granted a man to live upon. The San Joaquin valley of California has no greater natural facili ties to add to her greatness than the Santa Cruz valley possesses. The aid of capital and the scientific work of engineers will divert the waters from its presward the Colorado and distribute it skillfully and beneficially upon the many fartile acres now dormant and will be great indeed. The garden and the orchard, the vineyard and grain and from the midst of this scenery will loom up a commercial city not ancientized but rehabilitated and modernized the city of Tucson, whose destiny has been engraved and scribistically predicted long before present writers have blunders are made in the campaign, and the business courage and sagacity to portunity when they see it.
